

comes up over the hills and sends his cheerful rays unobstructed over our abiding places. We arise and stand before our east windows breathing deep the fresh air, unadulterated and void of smoke and dust.

Here the children play in perfect safety and grow up vigorous and healthy in body and mind.

We who are responsible for this booklet have nothing to sell those who receive it. The real estate we own in Bloomfield Estates constitutes our homesteads and we are satisfied with them.

Bloomfield Estates is a tract of beautiful land lying just north of the village of Birmingham, Mich.

A village, by the way, unique among villages contiguous to great cities and manufacturing centers. It has no factories and does not want any. It is devoid of any slum sections. It is a little city of homes, owned principally by the occupants. It has a splendid school system and a magnificent high school. It has good churches and a citizenry of high-class, law-abiding people.

Bloomfield Estates consists of about 350 acres, divided into plots of from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 acres. Its building restrictions are rigid enough to insure only desirable homes being built, but not strict enough to keep out the men and women of moderate means.

Only one residence can be built on each plot, which precludes any possibility of crowding.

The land is rolling enough to provide splendid
